Session Description

Students will explore how advances in technology and investment in human capital and in capital goods impact economic growth and standards of living.

Talking Points

1. Economic growth is defined as a sustained rise over time in a nation’s production of goods and services. This is measured as a percentage change in real GDP (real GDP was discussed in Session 8).

2. Economic growth is largely dependent on the following:
   a. The quantity of resources available: An economy can produce more if it has a larger labor force, a larger stock of capital, and/or more natural resources.
   b. The quality (productivity) of its resources: An economy can produce more if its resources become more productive—for example, through training and educating the labor force, improved capital, and/or better technology.

3. Other factors affecting economic growth include the following:
   a. the level of economic freedom of members of the society: Economic freedom refers to the ability to choose your work, choose where you live, choose to operate a business, and so on;
   b. the political stability of the country;
   c. the willingness and ability of society members to save;
   d. the level of government regulation of production and consumption;
   e. the opportunity to earn a profit by operating a business; and
   f. how efficiently society’s resources are allocated.

4. When real GDP expands, the unemployment rate tends to fall, although there is often a lag.

5. When real GDP contracts, the unemployment rate tends to rise, although there is often a lag.

6. When real GDP expands, the price level may rise, fall, or stay the same.

7. When real GDP contracts, the price level may rise, fall, or stay the same.
